D4: Dark Dreams Don't Die : Aplicativo do Mal a origem.Lysophosphatidylcholine-induced increase in phosphatidylcholine transfer protein association with the erythrocyte membrane. We have shown previously that lysophosphatidylcholine (lyso-PC) induces a translocation of phosphatidylcholine transfer protein (PC-TP) from an erythrocyte membrane fraction to a cytosolic fraction (Grubb, J. S., and Kini, J. L. (1986) J. Biol. Chem. 261, 10534-10539). In the present study, the effect of lyso-PC on the association of PC-TP with the membrane was studied using 125I-labeled PC-TP. Lyso-PC induced translocation of PC-TP to the cytosolic fraction was associated with an increase in PC-TP-membrane binding but had no effect on the amount of noncovalently bound PC-TP. Phosphatidylcholine-binding protein as a whole also bound to the membrane in a lyso-PC-dependent manner, but this binding did not increase with increasing concentrations of lyso-PC. In contrast, the amount of PC-TP-membrane binding was approximately doubled by an increase in the lyso-PC concentration up to 0.15% (v/v), which did not cause any translocation of PC-TP from the erythrocyte membrane to the cytosol. These results suggest that lyso-PC induces a conformational change in PC-TP, which results in an increase in the PC-TP-membrane association. This conformational change may be dependent on the lyso-PC concentration but independent of the translocation of the enzyme itself to the cytosol.[An early effect of
