She doesn't ask me to opine about any of the claims that are made in the report. Instead, the host launches into the study itself, which she describes as a report from the National Research Council. This immediately sets the frame. The report isn't "agenda-driven," which might have made more sense. I find a lot of the report's language to be rather slippery. "Theoretical probability of global warming by 2100?" "Climate sensitivity?" "Climate feedbacks?" So many words that don't have clear meanings. At the end, Gross discusses the report's summary. I think she could have made it much clearer and more accessible. But she makes a good point when she observes that the summary is "overly simplistic." The first page concludes with this statement: "If the greenhouse gas emissions continue on their current trajectory, the result is likely to be a warmer climate with global temperatures rising about 3 degrees C by 2100 and sea levels increasing by about 20 meters." That's a lot of numbers. One number per page. We're not given any context. Nowhere do we see how the projections are made. And, to be frank, I don't want to see numbers 2d92ce491b
