However, the lake is also one of the most important and complex freshwater aquifers on the planet. Mongolia has few lakes with a surface area larger than Lake Orto-Ilgen, which is located in a basin carved from the mountains by the glaciers of Mongolia's Khovd region during the last ice age. The area that has become the lake contains about 200 billion tons of water, which is about half of the amount of water that is stored in the world's oceans. The water that makes up Lake Orto-Ilgen is not fresh. It has been there for at least 7,000 years, and scientists have long believed that the water was contaminated with an organic material called humic acids, which is responsible for its unusual color. For some time now, scientists have been puzzling over the source of this contaminated water. Lake Orto-Ilgen sits on what was once a tectonic rift valley. There, scientists have found large quantities of volcanic material, including the glass-like minerals that form when lava cools. But it is not clear how long the water has been in the lake, or how long the volcanic material has been there. There is one more mystery. Lake Orto-Ilgen sits on top of a lava flow called the Urdai

Tsai volcano, which is covered in a layer of orange-yellow clay that was deposited about 1,300 years ago. But around Lake Or
