Russia, an ally of the Assad regime, has refuted the U.S. claims of impending chemical attacks, with Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov insisting that such accusations are the result of a policy that is built on "a completely groundless basis". The allegations have come after pictures and video emerged showing evidence of what appeared to be Syrian chemical weapons caches. "What was declared by the Secretary of State [Mike] Pompeo to be a red line, the use of chemical weapons by the government of Syria would change the equation, in our view, and this was a false red line," Lavrov said. "If we are talking about chemical weapons, everyone should just be aware that Syria has no chemicals of any kind of use to it, that it has not even got any ammunition for chemical weapons," he added. "We have received information that the Syrian authorities may possibly be preparing a large-scale chemical attack in the future." U.S. Secretary of State Mike Pompeo said after a high-level security meeting in Montreal on Tuesday, January 15. (Reuters) A senior U.S. diplomat on Monday night also warned of "unacceptable risks" in the event that the regime does launch chemical weapons attacks. "We are watching the regime's preparations, and there are some important and unacceptable risks if the regime uses chemical weapons," U.S. Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs Thomas Shannon said at a press briefing in Montreal. "We would not be part of that." The comments came after a high-level security meeting in Montreal on Tuesday, January 15, in which U.S. Secretary of State Mike Pompeo warned that the Syrian government may use chemical
