Transparency around food miles and other environmental and social impacts would allow consumers to know where the food they eat comes from and how it was produced. The UN was trying to prevent consumers' concerns about what was in their food from dissuading them from buying it. As shoppers become more aware of the impacts of their food choices, they may prefer to buy from producers who provide higher quality goods. The UN was concerned that shoppers would stop buying from smaller, high-quality food suppliers if they knew that their meat came from intensively farmed animals or that their fish came from unsustainable stocks. The UK was also concerned that smaller, high-quality food companies would be in trouble if they knew that their goods were produced on land that was harming the environment and causing climate change. UK ban In 2005 the UK banned labelling of food's environmental impact. But campaigners say consumers should be able to know how their food has been produced. So far the EU has banned labelling for just under half the EU's food. The UK has pledged to review the decision to ban food labels. There are currently four mandatory "green" labelling schemes operating in the EU. They cover: labels listing the agricultural production system labels listing the use of endangered species labels indicating genetically modified organisms labels indicating the geographical origin of the product. They are all monitored by the European Food Safety Authority and have to be kept up-to-date. Expression of CD30 on B- and T-cell lymphomas and chronic lymphocytic leukemia. The expression of CD30 has been correlated with several immunologically based diseases. The purposes of the study were to examine the extent to which CD30 is expressed on lymphoid cells from patients with B-cell non-Hodgkin's lymphomas (NHLs), Hodgkin's disease, 2d92ce491b
