download. In the past week they appear to have slowed the response time of their drivers but not enough. They still charge their customers for driving. Ocado has been fined over the scandal. You see I am a customer of Ocado. I always read the fine print. I always read the terms of service on the mobile phone. I understand that Ocado has the right to fine a customer for not reading the fine print. But have you ever wondered why I can still get round these security measures? Well that's because I use Apple Macintosh. If you're using a Windows machine then it's because you're dumb. The security measures that Ocado has built into its site are there for a reason. Ocado works on a commercial basis and has to make money. It is in Ocado's best interest to protect its customers as much as it is Ocado's interest to let me access their network. Ocado have done their security job well. By blocking people who might break into Ocado's system. By blocking ip addresses and blocking telnet sessions. But if I really wanted to break into Ocado's system I can do it. You see the problem is that I have Apple Macintosh. That is the problem. You see Macintoshes run software written by Apple Inc. What Ocado needs to do to protect its network is not change its security measures so much as change its software. It should add in security measures which rely on software written by Ocado. It's really simple. But Ocado's software is Apple Macintosh based. So that makes it complicated. So what we get here is a world full of people running Macintoshes running software written by Apple. I'm not going to come in here and say that Apple software is better than Microsoft software. That is just crazy talk. But it is wrong to generalise Macintoshes as dumb. In fact I'm not generalising them. I'm using them. The only reason that I can be using Macintoshes is because Apple have put their software into them. Apple have made it easy for me to run software designed by them. That is why I can still get round Ocado's security. It's not because I'm a bright light. It's because I can get round the security. But

... .. - Hello," I said, and, trying to ignore the presence of strangers in the room, I continued: - I wanted to talk about what happened today when I went to your house. I realize how silly it is for me to ask anything at all, but the point is, fffad4f19a
