Here is my code: `int add(int a, int b) { return a + b; }` Can someone tell me why I can't call the add function like this: `printf("The result is: %d", add(3, 4));` I read that you can't use the `` or `[]` for invoking functions so I try this. A: You cannot overload a function for different arguments. All functions with the same name are of the same type Your function declaration can be rewritten `int add(int a, int b) { return a + b; }` A: You cannot use the `[]` or `` in a declaration of the function name, as in: `int add(int a, int b); int add(int a, int b) { return a + b; }` What is going to happen is that the declaration of the function has a declaration

A: In your case you have a error in the variable $toupload $toupload = '../cache/'; Should be $toupload = '../cache/'. $id; This is because you are concatenating a integer to a string in your $toupload var. FULL SOLUTION: $_SESSION['userid'] = $id; $insert = mysqli_query($con, "INSERT INTO public_to_private(userid, private_key, public_key, platform, notes, date) VALUES ($userid, '$toupload', '$toupload', '$platform', '$notes', now()) ON DUPLICATE KEY UPDATE public_key = '$toupload' WHERE userid = '$userid'") or die(mysqli_error($con)); if ($insert) { echo 'OK'; } else { echo 'Something went wrong, check connection'; die; } $userid = mysqli_insert_id($con); Selling a TV is notoriously tough. Even when you just want to sell one on your own, there’s a ton of information to disseminate, a physical product to package and present, and somewhere on the interwebs you’re guaranteed to find something insulting to pour gas on all of the above. The allure of being able to sell on your own is one of the perks of selling on ETSY—one less thing to think about, or maybe even budget for. There are a ton of ways to sell on ETSY. A quick search reveals dozens of categories and sub-categories, from trinkets to tubs. The beauty of ETSY is that you can find all sorts of pricing structures to suit whatever price point you’re most comfortable with, from the traditional $2 listing to a storefront e-commerce site. You can also use your own store, build off of Etsy’s designs, or use something like Shopify to build a full-on e-commerce site on top of E ba244e880a
