A real learning curve for Photoshop is that you must understand how the layers work and how to stack them in order to edit them effectively. The ability to mask and retouch is essential for many professional types of image manipulation. You can learn Photoshop in a few minutes if you have a reasonable amount of time, yet with a little practice, you can quickly master it. There's no need to hire a Photoshop guru or shell out thousands of dollars for expensive image editing software to do just a little bit of your own work. In this chapter, I cover some of the basics for making basic edits to your photos. You can modify the basic colors, brightness, and contrast to clean up photos by using the steps discussed in this chapter. Understanding the Layers System You've probably never heard of a layer before, but trust me: They're a big part of the Photoshop toolbox. You use layers to separate a photo and apply one editing step to part of a photo, and then another editing step to part of the photo. You can do anything from simple brightness adjustments to very complex compositing effects, such as those for creating some truly stunning collages (see Figure 11-1). The canvas behind a photo can hold any number of layers. You can adjust the density and transparency of any single layer to make it fully or partially invisible, which you can then combine with other layers to create some pretty cool composites. Layers are what gives Photoshop the ability to do its magic. Without them, you wouldn't have much of a tool with which to construct a collage. Fortunately, Photoshop has a simple enough layer system that you can get a handle on them quickly. You can actually skip the entire process of creating and naming layers, and go directly to the action of combining and blending them. Figure 11-1: Layers are a big part of Photoshop. They're a powerful tool for image editing. Setting up a new work area One of the things that gets overlooked when you first start in Photoshop is setting up a new work area or canvas for your photo. If you're just starting, setting up a new work area is one of the first steps to getting started with Photoshop because if you mess up, you waste time and space that's ultimately wasted. To set up a new work area, follow these steps: 1. Create a new, blank document. You may need to select a preset, such as

Milk from 7 cows was sampled between 1 and 65 d postpartum. Each sample was analyzed for concentrations of fat, protein, lactose, and solid not fat. No cow was examined at the same milking time daily, so that the probability of the bovine milk chemically resulting from the same milking varied. The large majority of the data were discrete values rather than concentrations, and normal measurements for milk constituents were computable using a fixed z-score. Regression of fat on protein and lactose (from the earlier milkings) gave rise to a linear regression in the region around the control region where these milk constituents are physically and chemically equal to each other. Regression of protein on fat (from the later milkings) gave rise to a nonlinear regression. There was a linear regression at the control region and a constant slope less than one at much lower fat. The data are consistent with the supposition that a nonlinear regression could result from sequential combinations of two discrete processes.Q: What is an example of a language that is (very) context-free but not deterministic context-free? I am looking for a language that is context-free, but not deterministic context-free, specifically, a language that is not accepted by any deterministic pushdown automaton but that is accepted by some nondeterministic pushdown automaton. I have a feeling that the language of the even numbers is such a language, though I can't show it. Any ideas? A: A context-free language can be deter

Q: Spring 5 JpaRepository subquery with multiple where clause I need to do a subquery in JpaRepository which has multiple where clauses. I have following query: select u from User u where (select count() from ApiMetadata a where a.userId = u.id and a.type = 1) > 2 and u.userId in (select user_id from Ingredient where ingredient_id = ${ingredient_id}) I can do this simple query as: @Query(value = "select u from User u where (select count() from Ingredient i where i.user_id = u.id and i.ingredient_type = 1) > 2 and u.userId in (select user_id from Ingredient where ingredient_id =?0)", nativeQuery = true) public Page findInList(Pageable pageable); But how to do this in JpaRepository? The query should be in subquery format. How can I do this with JpaRepository? A: I have done this by adding @Query annotation for subquery at Repository level. In this example, the status field will be annotated with @Param annotation. This field has a list of values. These values will be populated from subquery. Sample code: List users = repository.findAll(new Query().where(new Predicate().and(new Predicate().like("status", "%{status}%")).or(new Predicate()
