Tutorial: Using a Sample Image

If you were to create an image today in Photoshop, how would you go about it? Most photographers would create one or more basic compositions using elements that make sense to them, whether it be a white background, a colorful border, text, or some other recognizable graphic element. Photoshop gives you the ability to quickly add graphic elements and arrange them so that they fit in the scene. Let's create an image to play with. To do this, go to File → New. Choose the Grayscale dialog box. Save your file in an appropriate folder, such as `iMacOsXRetouching.psd`. 1. After you've saved your document, choose File

I've already mentioned several times that other people will probably have views about how the apps work. I myself haven't used many, so if someone else can tell me if they do need either iOS or Android, that would be awesome! I can't imagine why you'd download both on different devices, but I'm obviously not in your shoes so take it with a pinch of salt! *NOTE: I said about a year ago that I would try and write a post about these apps but I've never gotten around to it. Frankly, I've just never managed to find the time. I now see how I could be perpetually procrastinating, but as you can tell, it has now been a while since the switch to Android happened and I have now got a lot more posts that require, well, a lot of time and effort. So it looks like the page for you, fellow readers, is the best place for updated content! 6 comments Hi Leanne. Looks like a great way to save some money while getting up to date apps. I just dislike that in order to download the apps, you have to visit the store and... well... wait. I guess it would make more sense to download the apps at the same time you purchase the OS, but I don't know how that could be done. Now I gotta go and try to fix up the layout of this page as I've been meaning to do that too. I've been using the Android developer app and it's been great but I've recently switched back to an iPhone. You can easily download apps from the iOS app store and then transfer them to your Google account on Android. Another thing is that I have an Android tablet so don't really need a smartphone. I don't mind waiting around to download the Android apps, but I do mind waiting around for updates! That could be a real pain when you're using the app regularly (and if you're an app addict like me, that's a very real concern). I do know what you mean though! I bought my phone last week and I'm still testing the Android apps and functions! The best thing is that I'm not tied to my phone because of my job so if there are no other good apps, I can just

Physical Education LETTERS TO THE EDITOR Sept. 12, 2000 LETTERS TO THE EDITOR Dear Editor: Many readers of your column might disagree with a few points in the article by Harvey Siegel about school sports programs (September 4). Siegel's points were that if students are not engaged by a sport in the eighth grade, they should not play any sport in the ninth grade. He made no mention of the skill level needed by the eighth grader to play a sport. What skills must a student have? I believe that students need to feel challenged physically. In today's society, most students' physical challenge is usually at the office desk. Another point I disagree with is that physical education is primarily about health. I believe that physical education is also about character-building, self-esteem, and a positive self-image. I also differ with Siegel on the point that students should receive the same sports experience year after year. When students graduate from high school, they are not the same people they were a year or two ago. There are new challenges, and new needs. Physical education used to be a traditional part of most high school curriculums, but the state has decided that physical education cannot take place in high schools. Siegel mentions that the number of students taking physical education has been declining. Some physical education programs have had success in high schools. More programs can and should be added. On the whole, I believe that some students should continue to be in a physical education program, but students who are not interested in physical education can be withdrawn from it and provided with a variety of alternatives. Before kindergarten, the focus of child care should be on discovering and nurturing the "three R's." What do parents do with and to their children? Are they nurturing? What is the goal of child care? How do caregivers focus on the developmental needs of their charges? Can the R's alone provide the answers? A self-guided search on the Internet will provide answers. Nurturing your child is one way to achieve these goals. Is your child being nurtured at home, in a child care center, or with the aide at your child care center? Answering these questions is a start. A.L.
