Environmental degradation of medicines by polar contaminants and consumers' interventions: A case study. Polar contaminants (PCs) including pharmaceuticals and personal care products (PPCPs) are persistent organic pollutants in water. Different PCPs are distributed in a different way in the environment. This study aimed to investigate the distribution of four different PCPs (carbamazepine, triclosan, metoprolol and nitrobenzene) in the water of Tianjin and the change after pollution load reduction and was based on the investigation of seven sampling sites and three types of polar contaminants. The main pollutants were detected in Tianjin water, especially at the Fuxi River, the main river of Tianjin. Carbamazepine and triclosan were the most widely distributed PCPs and generally exhibited higher concentrations at the sewage treatment plant and Fuxi River. The percentage of carbamazepine and triclosan in WWTP effluents in Tianjin was 57.3-84.4% and 47.6-67.6%, respectively. The ratio of carbamazepine and triclosan concentration in sewage to the concentration in WWTP influent was generally  $>1$  and  $>0.5$  for these two PCPs, indicating that the removal of these two PCPs in sewage treatment plants is not significant, and low removal efficiency was observed at Fuxi River. The PCP concentration in the Fuxi River was higher than that in the Bay of Tianjin, indicating that the concentration of PCPs in the Bay of Tianjin is caused by local emission. The maximum concentration of carbamazepine and triclosan was 4,910.5 ng L<sup>-1</sup> and 3,813.4 ng L<sup>-1</sup>, respectively, and 99.1% of carbamazepine and 86.4% of triclosan concentration was in the form of non-polar pollutants. Reducing the discharge of non-polar pollutants in WWTP effluents can reduce the risk of pollutants to the aquatic environment. The PCPs concentration was not changed after treatment by consumers, which indicated that the treatment by consumers can reduce the risk of the pharmaceuticals.
