It isn't just the challenge of getting forces back to shore quickly, but what those forces will be expected to do once they get there. At the moment, the three services are all doing very different things. The Navy is focused on securing ships and platforms for the Trump administration's upcoming review of its nuclear policy. It's also got a few more ships and a few more aircraft ready to be deployed than it did when the Obama administration ended the previous review in 2010. The Marine Corps, meanwhile, has drawn up plans to send several hundred Marines to Australia to help bolster that country's security in the wake of recent shootings in Melbourne and the upcoming Winter Olympics. And the Coast Guard is going to start arming more of its personnel with personal firearms to protect them on the high seas. Trump isn't just a singular figure, a president with one set of priorities.

He and his team are at the same time a political force to be reckoned with. There are other figures in the administration, such as Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, Defense Secretary James Mattis, chief White House strategist Steve Bannon and National Security Adviser H.R. McMaster, who are well-equipped to make
