They are in a digital format which can be downloaded, distributed, and played on PCs, and is capable of being broadcast via a variety of Internet broadcasts, although podcasting and broadcast are not necessarily the same. In the meantime, an LP of 'Waiting for the Sky to Fall' was released in the US. Such an awesome album to be released in the USA and not the UK: it's a rare achievement to be recognised on both sides of the Atlantic. The cover features a striking photo of a ship in distress, possibly the SS Eddington which was run aground and sank off the south coast of England in 1955. There's a bit of choice by the band as they have included a couple of songs from the forthcoming debut album. We're rather hoarding it for when it's out in the UK. 'Waiting for the Sky to Fall' uses a lot of classical elements (yes, they're that good) but also brings a bit of bluesy grooviness and rock'n'roll to proceedings with Harper's unique bass guitar playing very much in evidence throughout the album. 'Astronomy Dominant', which begins the album, is very much in the same vein as 'Sonic Attack' from the first Hawkwind album, 'Space Ritual', with a staccato guitar intro and Harper's electric bass and drums before progressing into a real groove. 'Dawn And The Forests Of Heaven' also sounds like a fuzzy, funky middle-eight to begin with. The music has a hypnotic quality to it and the drums are rolling along nicely
