Though several of these recent home-buying trends in Brooklyn are a bit exaggerated or hyped-up, there is still something to be said for the excitement surrounding first-time home ownership. Prelude to You-Know-Who's Happenings When Brooklyn's 105-year-old Ditmas Park Playground first received a controversial $12 million expansion plan from a private developer, there was an outcry among the neighborhood's 8,000-strong community to keep it open to its youth. And when that deal fell apart, numerous community activists spoke up again, this time pushing for a proposal that would keep the playground open to the public and avoid major construction. Now, a community-based, non-profit organization called the Ditmas Park/Park Slope Community Development Corp. has gathered thousands of signatures to place a vote to the local Board of Standards and Appeals on whether to retain the playground or make it publicly accessible. "The idea of trying to get a community-based proposal to the [local] Board of Standards and Appeals so that it doesn't have the risk of going through the legal process to close it down is extremely exciting to me," says Justin Villegas, a Ditmas Park resident and community-development

The North Atlantic had a very active and well-integrated fishery in the second half of the 19th century. Between 1860 and 1930, the cod fishery expanded dramatically and it reached a peak in 1913-1918. This expansion caused increasing competition, mainly in the Baltic, in the North Sea, and off southern Norway. In this study we assess how spatial variation in fishing effort and gear was related to competition and natural mortality. We used a nested modeling approach, including fishing effort on the vessel, a proxy for the number of fishers, and a proxy for fishing gear. We modeled competition effects using spatial variation in predicted stock abundance in the North Sea and the Baltic. Natural mortality was estimated using trends in observed stock abundance and standard stock assessment models. We found evidence that fishing effort and gear varied spatially in the North Atlantic. Vessels and gear were spatially clustered on the coast of Norway in the north, the Gulf of Bothnia, the Baltic, the North Sea, and Iceland in the south. Additionally, gear was concentrated in the Norwegian Sea, the North Sea, and the Irish Sea, but fishing activity was also high around the coast of Iceland and British Isles. There were substantial regional differences in average fishing effort and gear between regions, especially in the North Atlantic. Variation in fishing effort and gear varied by competition and natural mortality. In regions with higher stock abundance, fishing activity decreased and there were fewer fisherman. World War II is often considered the “global” conflict of the twentieth century. Yet there were significant conflicts that occurred in the years leading up to and following the war. These conflicts not only impacted the areas directly involved in the fighting, but often spread beyond their borders, affecting many countries and cultures. This project will discuss different conflicts that took place in the Americas, Asia, Europe, the Middle East, Africa, Oceania, and Central and South America. I have included resources for each of these regions. World War II is often considered the “global” conflict of the twentieth century.
