A Republican gubernatorial candidate is running on the promise that he'll "never raise taxes on California's families," a promise he says will "end the public employee union's power and destroy its influence in Sacramento." But in his own words, he has a different agenda: Prop 32 would "amend California's Constitution to keep the majority of the state's wealth, which is paid for by taxpayers, from the public employee unions." Here's the candidate's story about it. It's November 2, 2012. There's going to be a vote on Proposition 32 in California. The people in California have voted, and the proposition passed. In California, any proposition that is approved by voters has to be placed on the California state ballot for the next election. The proposition will either remain on the ballot or not. In California, the State Constitution requires that a proposition be placed on the California state ballot for the next election by November 2, which is November 8. Therefore, this proposition is not on the November 2, 2012, state ballot. If the voters approve Prop 32, the proposition is not on the ballot in the next election. Even if the voters reject Prop 32, the proposition will not be on the ballot in
