* What do the numbers inside the parentheses represent? The number inside the parentheses represents the number of layers that you can have on top of another. So if you have two layers of type on top of an object, the number inside the parentheses would be two. The number outside the parentheses represents the number of pixels of the image you can change (refer to the "Image Layers" sidebar for more info on layers). For example, using the Info panel (Ctrl+I), you can see that you have one text layer, and there are 1,080 pixels of type to be changed.

All Aboard for the L.A. to Las Vegas Express! A regular reader of the Sam Sifton blog, a.k.a. the late, great New York Times food critic and adventurous traveler Sam Sifton, once told me that he wasn't sure what to do for his 50th birthday. "Actually, Sam, that's not true. It's not at all true. What do I want for my fiftieth birthday? How about a super-long, all-overnight train ride from Los Angeles to Las Vegas—with food! And really great service!" The reader's wishes were granted, and so was the birth of this blog. I have only one request, which is that you indulge your lust for adventure with me on this or any other journey, for I am not the most avid traveler. See "Project: 31 Days in a Row" on my blog. It will take you on a journey of epic proportions. The 2014 Los Angeles to Las Vegas all-night train trip has recently concluded—although you can still book tickets. So far there have been two classes of tickets sold. First up were luxury, all-suite sleeper car tickets. They are sold out. There are only a couple more, which are available for those willing to be in economy (traveling cars) for the whole trip. I traveled in economy—sans bed! And my experience was pretty awesome. I booked a single, which was clearly meant for one traveling companion. It was perfect for me. And the best part: I didn't need a reservation to board—I went straight in. There were some very large sleeping cars on the train, but there was plenty of room in the surprisingly spacious compartments. There were also cars that were for the dead. Just kidding—the trip was not all fun and games. The train left from Union Station in Los Angeles and would arrive in Las Vegas at a time I can't remember, but I would guess it was around 7:30 a.m. It was chilly but not cold. My beard was trimmed for the first time in months. I had shaved the morning before and worried that I would develop a black beard by the trip's end. About 10 minutes into the trip, I saw a handful of people working a grill on the train, and I started to reflect upon how rarely I actually just ate from a can. After a few seconds of fiddling with the lower button on

Q: Find & Replace SQL with regex I have a sql query that has some invalid data in it that are causing a SQL injection vulnerability. I am trying to use a regular expression to find the string, replace with a fixed value and then execute the query. I will eventually run this through mysqlimport but it is taking too long to process the entire.sql file at the moment. So I would like to replace just the one single instance of the bad string. I am not 100% on how regular expressions work, but for example I think it will be something like: Find: (\[.".\]) Replace: \1 "fixed value"\2 A: SQL Server has a replace function that works on strings, so you can build up your regular expression and use the replace function. For example: SELECT REPLACE('[a-z]', '[', '[${key}]') -- output: '[${key}]' SELECT REPLACE('[a-z]', '[', '[&key&]') -- output: '[&key&]' SELECT REPLACE('[a-z]', '[', '[${key}]') -- output: '${key}' SELECT REPLACE('[a-z]', '[', '[$&key&]') -- output: '$key' You could use regular expressions in find/replace. The documentation for the replace function contains this: If you use a regular expression to search for a string, you can replace the string by entering a regular expression in the replacement expression. The syntax would be something like this: REPLACE(string, expression, replacement_expression) or REPLACE(string, expression, replacement_expression, start_position, [length]) Check this Microsoft link for more info. As for normalization, one of the related articles on MSSQL Central says this: To avoid security problems, do not attempt to use regular expressions to modify a SQL-server stored procedure. I suspect your best shot is to use REPLACE() in a stored procedure that runs your update statements to convert them to a different form. That way you can keep that sql file safely in the filesystem rather than on your production server where it could
