We realize a single-photon source based on the optical nonlinearity of a diamond nanopillar fabricated by a focused ion beam. By inserting a nanohole array between the nanopillar and a diamond substrate, we can confine the propagation of the excited surface plasmon polariton in the nanopillar and a pair of quasiparticles in the free space by the nanohole array. It is demonstrated that the single-photon emission rate per nanohole per one nanosecond at room temperature can be as high as 5×10^{-3} . People are generally aware of the most common causes of hallucinations, like schizophrenia and a really high fever. But lesser known are the more rare causes; here are six you probably haven't heard about. Go ahead, dare to feel. Some people feel a mixture of fear and exhilaration at the prospect of challenging their comfort zone and "daring" to do something dangerous or uncomfortable. Psychologists say that these sensations are actually human versions of the relaxation response, a primitive response that occurs automatically when people face unfamiliar or threatening situations. The discovery of the relaxation response is actually a revival of an earlier idea, that of the parasympathetic nervous system, a body part of the nervous system that helps regulate bodily functions like digestion, blood pressure and respiration. The parasympathetic nervous system is the domain of the autonomic nervous system, whose opposite is the sympathetic nervous system, which governs activity in the fight-or-flight response, such as by raising heart rate, dilating pupils and constricting breathing. In the second half of the 20th century, however, a body of research known as "activity scheduling theory" investigated how people's autonomic nervous systems can be harnessed to help them fall asleep faster. These studies revealed that the body can be tricked into a tranquil, neutral state just by regulating everyday tasks (such as winding
