I know it's pretty easy to check if a string contains a given word, but I can't figure out how to use string.contains to see if a string contains a string with a specific string in it. For example, if I had the string "Hello world" and the word "wo", how could I use string.contains to find out whether the string contains "wo"? EDIT: To be clear, I'm not talking about using the Contains method on the string object. I'm talking about using string.contains to find out whether the string contains a given word with a specific string. A: Use regexp pattern /(?:hello|world)/. This pattern matches either hello or world substrings. To check if a string contains any of these substrings use str.indexOf. console.log("hello world".indexOf('hello') > -1); For case insensitive matching use /(?:HELLO|WORLD)/i. The "i" flag. If you need to replace the matched substring - use the String#replace method. const str = 'hello world'; const repl = 'hello world'; console.log(str.replace(/(?:HELLO|WORLD)/i, repl));

I've been working with the new entities (rather than with the traditional POCO object model) in a current project, and have been trying to see if I can improve performance, using ORMs such as LINQ to SQL and EF, even if just with my models. However, I recently started experimenting with being able to extend the entities using generic services. I was wondering if anyone had any experiences or advice with this topic. I have a generic service, that I only call as a convenience. Basically, I have a base class, that looks like this: public abstract 595f342e71
