The film below takes us through an in-depth look at what HyperMotion Technology is, and how it's used in FIFA 22. "When we found out that we'd be using the technology for FIFA, the big question was, how much, and what kind of data should we collect? This question came up on our testing process. We had already been using the system for a couple of years. We'd been testing it on a weekly basis. It was working as we expected. As for how much data to collect, the answer was: as much as we needed. We had no exact figure to think we could use, but it had to be in the order of tens of thousands of captures per player. Now, with thousands of nodes, it's easy to store tens of thousands of captures per player. So, once we had defined the level of accuracy we needed, we could think about how we could design a solution that would do the job." What is HyperMotion Technology? "With the technology, we can define and record in FIFA's millions of animations each and every player will go through during a real life game, all the way down to each footstrike, each tackle, each individual movement, and more." - Robbie Earle, FIFA Technical Lead. "As soon as a player is facing the camera and runs towards or away from the camera, the sensor records his footstrike. This gives us the frame that we can start using to create the animation." - Stephane Tavernier, FIFA Lead Animator. "We tracked hundreds and hundreds of animations. We created over one million new animations when we first tested the new technology, on the main career mode." - Henry, VFX artist. "This is a beautiful animation set that has incredible detail and high-fidelity." - David Sousa, VFX artist. "When we're tracking a player, we look at the movement that we're recording. The camera goes in the direction the player is going. What happens as a player comes out of a run and goes towards the camera, the camera's always recording that movement. In order to arrive at the closest position to the player's position in
