The effects of chronic alcohol on protein kinase C-dependent protein phosphorylation in murine colonic crypt cells. The effects of chronic alcohol consumption on protein kinase C-mediated protein phosphorylation have been examined in fractionated mouse colonic crypt cells. Crypt cells were isolated from the lower 10 mm of the crypt-villus axis. A substantial increase in [3H]leucine incorporation into proteins of lysates of crypt cells from alcohol-consuming mice was noted relative to control animals. This increase was due to increases in phosphorylation of the 90, 76, 55, 39, and 28 kDa proteins. The observation that chronic alcohol ingestion caused an increased phosphorylation of the above proteins of crypt cells but not other proteins was not due to an increase in the activities of PKC isozymes, calcium- or calcium/phospholipid-dependent kinases, cyclic nucleotide-dependent kinases, or CAMP-dependent protein kinase, and does not appear to be explained by a shift in substrate affinity of any one of these protein kinases. However, the results suggest a difference in substrate affinity in that one isozymic form of PKC phosphorylated only the 90, 76, and 55 kDa proteins. Alterations in protein kinase C-mediated protein phosphorylation appear to be directly related to the known changes in calcium- and protein kinase C-mediated second messenger systems that have been observed in alcohol-fed animals. These results demonstrate that a common mechanism may contribute to the multifaceted effects of chronic alcohol consumption on several cellular activities. 1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to a conveyor belt system wherein the conveyor belt is fed in a U-shaped path from the U-shaped feed passage to the feed passage for the downstream rollers and is passed there around both of the rollers. 2. The Prior Art Such a known conveyor belt system is described in German Pat. No. 26 30 646
