Monitoring of health status indicators related to the digestive system in a representative sample of Portuguese adult population. The digestive system is one of the more commonly affected systems in the general population, as well as in patients with chronic diseases. Indeed, digestive disorders are frequently associated with high medical and social costs. To estimate the prevalence of digestive system indicators in a representative sample of Portuguese adults, to investigate whether the variability of the prevalence estimates was related to socio-demographic variables and to evaluate their correlations with other indicators. Cross-sectional epidemiological study. A representative sample of adults aged 18-59 years from the whole national territory. The screening of digestive system indicators was performed with self-administered questionnaires. A randomly selected sub-sample completed the Gastrointestinal Symptom Rating Scale (GSRS) and a routine blood test. The study was carried out in the primary care setting in Portugal. The overall sample comprised 1650 subjects (M=41.5 years; SD=15.8). The prevalence of at least one digestive system indicator was estimated to be 38.7% in the sub-sample. Most participants had a good or very good health status (66.3%). Most frequent digestive symptoms were present in 27.1% of the sample (25.1% in men and 28.8% in women). This symptom prevalence was significantly higher in women than in men. Prevalence estimates of individual digestive system indicators decreased from the youngest to the oldest age group, except in the case of gastritis and reflux. Younger women, men and subjects with a higher education level reported a higher prevalence of gastritis and reflux. Most participants presented normal blood test results. The prevalence of digestive system indicators in the adult Portuguese population was high, although gender and age differences in prevalence were observed. An association was found between gastritis and reflux and age and gender. Self-reported digestive symptoms correlated significantly with some blood test results.Q: "Certified for" or "Certified with"? "Certified for" or "Certified with"? I have a disagreement with my friend. He wants me to write the following sentence: "Last year, it was certified for ice fishing". But I think it should be: "Last year, it was certified with ice fishing". Which one is correct? A: "Certified with ice fishing" is correct. "Certified for ice fishing" is not correct. Last year, it was with [or

Stealing an idea, again Every once in a while, I'll run across an episode of The Simpsons I find interesting or amusing because it used an idea I already felt like I had come across before: Homer's top hat. You know the one. Homer looks in the mirror and proclaims, "I am the greatest and only leader of the free world!" From that point on, the episode goes off the rails. After he's been told that he's being officially declared "The Most Famous Man In The World," Homer begins sifting through all of his many awards, and he discovers a postage stamp honoring his name, rather than the POTUS he assumed it was. I've seen this on TV a number of times before, and so have you. The idea, obviously, was stolen from Citizen Kane. And of course, if you've seen that film, you'll know it was put to good use in a couple of episodes of The Simpsons. In one, the idea of a heart being broken by an election goes through an entire series of ridiculous and funny permutations before one that ends up being more or less successful. In another, it's a bit of a Halloween episode, as Bart's costume includes a Boy Scout's uniform, complete with a pin in his forehead. I've recently been thinking a lot about those two episodes, because the idea of an election that breaks the hearts of everyone involved, and a costume that uses the boy scout's uniform as a bit of misdirection are both ideas that were stolen from Citizen Kane. I'm not making some sort of accusation here, so much as I'm trying to figure out if it's coincidence or a clever inside joke or something else entirely. So, here's what I'm thinking: The first instance was stolen from the idea at the end of Citizen Kane, in which Welles' own presidential election campaign was featured as one of the more impressive demonstrations of a hero's journey. I thought the exact idea came up last year in the other Simpsons, when it was used as a major plot element, and I do it just a couple of days after the fictionalized version was put to good use in that other movie. And now I think I'm onto something here. Maybe I'm onto
