We report on a 13-year-old boy who was admitted to the hospital with an enlarged left cervical lymph node. The left supraclavicular lymph node was excised and a biopsy revealed histiocytic infiltration. Three months later, a regrowth of the tumor occurred. The tumor cells were cultured and the tumor specific polymerase chain reaction was performed. A viral etiology for this growing lesion could be demonstrated: a virus was isolated from the patient. The virus was designated herpesvirus PCR4A (group 4). The cytological characteristics of this cultured cell and the chromosomal pattern of the karyotype indicate that the originally obtained biopsy of the lesion and the regrowth of the tumor was the result of a squamous cell transformation of the original tumor. The transformation could be induced in cell culture using phytohemagglutinin-P. The present invention relates to laser safety systems which, upon detection of various events, will change the laser protective fusing of a laser-marked object to some alternative safer configuration. Various methods are known in the art for protecting lasers from injury to the operator and bystander. If an operator of a laser system momentarily detaches the input optical fiber from the output optical fiber, the laser will automatically shut-off within 10 milliseconds, providing an immediate safety advantage. This type of system can also operate in many hazardous environments and still provide an important safety advantage. However, the system cannot be employed in some environments without substantially affecting its safety. For example, the system cannot function in a hazardous environment such as a flame. Further, the system is vulnerable to deliberate detachment of the input fiber. Disposable cover for protecting a laser from inadvertent direct contact with the operator also is known in the art. The disposable cover has a rigid shell that encloses an open-ended channel. The open end is located in the end of the shell and the channel is aligned with the laser beam. The cover protects the operator by directing the laser beam through the channel. However,
