Q: In my Rails app, why won't I get "No such file or directory - open /var/app/Settings.sqlite" when I run my migrations? In my Rails app, I have a migration that creates a file. The path that's specified in the migration file contains some spaces in it, which I've been told is not a valid file path. I get an error like this: db/migrate/my_migration_here.rb:14:in `block in up': No such file or directory - open /var/app/Settings.sqlite (Errno::ENOENT) I've tried replacing the spaces with underscores, and even copying and pasting from Stack Overflow, but I always get this error. Where in the Settings.sqlite file is there a space in it, and how can I fix this? A: The problem is that you're using spaces in the path. Spaces in paths are significant in SQLite, and mean something different than they do in other file systems, like Windows. Try this in a shell instead of your Rails migration: sqlite3 Settings.sqlite Q: What is the use of EFI/Ubuntu/shimx64.efi? For Ubuntu image building what is the use of EFI/Ubuntu/shimx64.efi file? ubuntu/efi/usb.img is the expected target image for UEFI booting and x86/boot/ubootx64.bin is the bootloader that boots UEFI boot. Why is the shimx64.efi file is there in ubuntu/efi folder? I can't understand the purpose of this file. A: shimx64.efi is part of kernel, which is used to transfer to UEFI compatibilized loader. With this efi files, basic UEFI booting is support, so you can build UEFI bootable image.

D.C. has a $63 billion budget, but its police force, which guards around 870,000 people and is the fourth largest in the country, is small. According to the Police Performance Institute, a D.C. think tank, the city has 2,000 to 2,400 active officers, down from about 2,400 in 2005. Between 2008 and 2013, the same year that there were no deaths, the number of sworn officers dropped by 7.1 percent. The officer-to-residents ratio is among the lowest in the country, according to a 2012 D.C. Metropolitan Police Department report, and the number of complaints of police misconduct is rising. Another problem for the Department of Human Services, which has a budget of $6.2 billion, is a shortage of homeless beds. Last year, the agency operated only 24 shelters, compared to 110 in 2010. Last week, a Washington Post reporter was turned away after standing vigil outside a shelter run by the government's food service agency on 11th Street. "They said we couldn't stay long and there were no beds," the reporter wrote. "After a while, I gave up on the idea." Where Are the Homeless? (click here for interactive map) For years, the District has chased an elusive yet iconic goal: reforming how the city's low-income residents get by — and how to help them stay off the streets. The aim was part social engineering project, part economic development strategy, and part bureaucratic ambition. District officials began mapping the underground economy of low-wage workers who get paid cash under the table, organize the sex trade and sell drugs for survival. In 2014, D.C. police director Cathy Lanier proposed a series of fines and short-term jail sentences for jaywalking, then in 2017 the council decriminalized the offense altogether. One of the most ambitious programs has been the Homeless Outreach and Prevention Program, or H.O.P.P., which purports to train "street outreach teams" to connect the 3,500 homeless people in the District with affordable housing, mental health services and job training. The budget for the program is just over $20 million a year, but many advocates of homeless housing say it is badly underfunded. "I'm encouraged by what the District government is trying to do," said Lisa Handley of the Coalition of Homeless
