Published: 9/7/2013 10:00 AM ST. PAUL, Minn. (AP) -- Minnesota lawmakers are deciding where to put a new Minnesota Vikings stadium, following a nearly four-year debate over where to build the stadium and how to pay for it. A $1.1 billion Vikings stadium would be built on the east side of downtown Minneapolis' skyscrapers and entertainment district, at the site of the Metrodome. It could also be built on the west side of downtown, close to Minneapolis State University, at the site of the old U.S. Bank Stadium. Here's a look at where the stadium debate stands, and where it's likely to go. 1. Minneapolis and the Star Tribune envision the stadium as a showcase of Minnesota's culture, pointing to the state's Scandinavian heritage. The location is on the site of the old Metropolitan Sports Facilities Commission building, where the Vikings held training camp in 2012 before playing their preseason games in the U.S. Bank Stadium in downtown Minneapolis. Vikings owner Zygi Wilf envisions a "multisport" facility built around a home for professional football. The stadium could also feature a new home for the Minnesota Orchestra and a new Minnesota House of Twins, bringing together the Twins, the Vikings and the Timberwolves. Some details have not been settled. 2. The same plans were submitted to a pair of Twin Cities-based stadiums authority boards, which have the power to approve the financing and construction plans. These groups are the Metrodome Redevelopment Authority and the Sports Facilities Authority, both created by the Minnesota Legislature in 2009. They are expected to take years to do their work. In the meantime, a public group has formed to lobby the groups to approve the stadium. Its estimated cost is $82 million. 3. The Vikings still have not identified an investor to buy the team and pay for the stadium, though the team has reached an agreement with an investor group headed
