The acute effect of Daunorubicin (DNR) (35 mg/kg i.v.) on the exocrine pancreatic function was evaluated in the rat, by measuring the concentration of pancreatic enzymes in pancreatic juice, and the DNR content in plasma. The amylase concentration in pancreatic juice was depleted by 26% (P less than 0.001) within 20 minutes after DNR administration, and returned to normal values after 60 minutes. The protein concentration in the pancreatic juice and the DNR content in plasma were not modified by DNR administration. These results show that the pancreatic exocrine function is largely impaired by the administration of DNR.
