Far-right populist policies are actually crowding out conservative policies on the continent, as the growth of far-right parties like the Alternative für Deutschland in Germany, Eurosceptic and anti-immigration parties across the continent, and the Lega in Italy poses a real threat to conservatives in terms of popularity. The reason for this is that populist parties are becoming more popular in the EU while conservative parties are becoming less popular. Although the U.K. and America are two distinct cases, the general pattern is the same — support for conservative parties is dropping in the EU while support for populist parties is rising. To understand why this is occurring, we need to explore the reasons for electoral support in politics. Populism is often associated with high unemployment and negative population growth. In Europe, those economic crises have passed. There is a diverse economy and high employment. It is thus plausible that declining support for conservative parties is linked to populism as the voters blame the conservatives for economic stagnation. A second explanation could be connected to immigration and the refugee crisis. Again, there is ample evidence to support these claims: populist parties have a larger appeal among voters who are opposed to immigration. E.U. population by country of origin, 2017 Source: Euris.eu Within the E.U., population growth is highest in the Eastern member states — Ireland and Malta, among others. This occurs for a number of reasons: people who immigrate in the E.U. typically come from countries which have larger populations than their own, and have different cultural origins from their citizens. The impact of this migration on the overall population is found in political terms. Populism has a higher appeal among those who are likely to be afraid of immigration, and who are likely to think, “the people are taking our country away from us.” This is naturally not true — it is unclear how that sort of thinking can occur in a democratic system. Yet this phenomenon is widespread and we can measure how this is occurring empirically. There is a growing evidence base to support that populism is related to immigration, and that negative sentiment toward immigration affects voting preferences among conservative parties. The connection may be even stronger if we look at immigration data for the E.U. in a different way: Immigration in the E.U. from Turkey and other non-European countries increased substantially in the last decade. Yet it denies ISIS TV beheading of female aid worker Published duration 15 December 2015 image copyright AFP image caption Two French hostages, among others, were beheaded last year France has denied claims by Islamic State (IS) that it was responsible for beheading a female aid worker, in an act that has been dubbed "horrific". The move came as MPs asked the government to ease its policy of relying on air strikes against IS to defeat the group in Iraq and Syria. The UN humanitarian chief expressed his "great concern" at the beheading. In October, Frenchwoman Hoda Muthana, 24, and an Indonesian were also killed by IS militants. 'Horrifying, barbaric' Hoda Muthana, who had been living in the UK, was originally from Muhajireen camp in Syria, one of the three refugee camps in the war-torn country where people are being held. Her death has prompted calls for France to rethink its policy of air strikes, which have been vital in the coalition led by the United States against IS.
