Visual markers are placed on players, allowing their movements and technical actions to be tracked with the camera in games. After the match, pre-production of the video is carried out using the visual tracking and data recorded during the match. For the first time, real-life movements are captured in FIFA, including the striker's run-up, the striker's movements when he receives the ball, the striker's movements when he tries to dribble past the defender, the striker's movements when he tries to receive the pass, and so on. This will translate directly into the player's real-world movement in gameplay. The gamer's job is to mimic the movements and technical actions of the player as closely as possible to create a realistic, virtual football match – even though the player involved has not yet performed them. For players, the motion capture suits help them to train on the pitch. The data is captured in real-time while the player is performing the actions. The technology will also help players improve their technical and decision-making skills in games. A motion capture suit can cost as little as EUR 3,000, and can be rented for between EUR 15 to EUR 100 a day depending on the number of players and the sophistication of the motion capture camera, and the data storage capacity. All 22 players from the 3rd and 4th divisions in Energetikos FC will receive motion capture suits for the 2019-20 season. Players on loan to Olympiacos Volou FC and Ergotelis FC will have suits fitted in their respective cities. There are many ways that a company can handle the storage and transport of explosive materials for use in the workplace, and many are commonly used in industry today. The two most common ways are referred to as "line storage" and "bulk storage." In a line storage facility, a large container is located at the particular facility that requires the explosive material, and the container is filled with the explosive material from a supply source. If the explosive material is then not needed at that particular site, the container of explosive material is transported back to the supply source. In a bulk storage facility, an explosive material container is located, and a separate supply of the explosive material is provided for that container. In order to use the explosive material, the container of explosive material is brought into the particular site that requires the explosive material, and the container
