, which would trigger hundreds of thousands of gallons of wastewater flooding into the streets. It is not just about safety, the latest estimate has a 23-cent price tag. There is no way the EPA will pay for the whole thing, but they will have to contribute some funding. The worst sewage spill in history took place in the 2010 Haiti earthquake. Seven years later, it is, according to the EPA, still the biggest chemical spill in US history. It has not yet completely cleaned up the mess. Long story short: large, more dangerous spills have happened before. The rates are very low, and neither Exxon, BP, Shell, or Chevron are going to risk their business plans by sending the TPT into the Gulf of Mexico. The risk of this spill is small. So, in the words of Congressman Bono, we need to “get the hell out of the way.” And what would that do for the planet? Say that this spill is the biggest threat to the planet. The risk of that happening is extremely low. So we could just write off this spill as a small price to pay for the benefit of the planet. Don’t go for it. There is an ancient saying: “if the emperor has no clothes, but you bring him new ones, then he will reveal the ones that were his all along.” The whole basis of the Alberta Tar Sands and the growth of the so-called “clean” energy industries is based on naivete about the ecological effects. Water wars can be inevitable if they are used as a weapon to force through plans that are opposed by the public and the environment. I remember the water wars in the 60’s in a city in West Germany. German cities were being destroyed because they were building their grandiose plans to build cities according to the model of the American “dream cities”. The rationale was, that it would provide jobs for the American economy. It was a collective effort – women, labor, civil society and men who should have marched in the streets to mobilize opposition. But the cities were built with sand instead of cement, and the water pipes were buried in the grounds rather than sitting in the ground – and people suffered the effects of many unused pipes that broke and let water out in the streets. The big problem with fighting “global warming” is: we are heading for a water war. I
