Autodesk Quantity Takeoff 2013 Serial Key 2012 2011 APK.Q: What is the correct response to "I don't know" vs. "I don't care"? From what I've gathered, the correct response to a question that does not fit a certain category (e.g. do you know, do you care, etc.) is, "I don't know/care". However, I have heard other people say "I don't know" as well. Shouldn't the correct response be the same? Or, is this just a matter of style, and I should say "I don't know"? A: If you are asked a question and you don't know the answer, then it would be correct to say you don't know or that you don't know how to answer the question. "I don't know" would be appropriate if the question is too broad or unclear to determine if you know or not. However, this is so common that it is not universally correct, or a good way of answering a question. So while it is correct, there is no requirement to use "I don't know" to state that you don't know the answer, or don't care about the answer. It's only correct if the question you are answering is too broad or unclear (and even then I think it is still very common). Additionally, there are times when you say something as a way of simplifying your answer when you don't want to answer the question, for example saying that something is true to save time or effort. So while it can be correct, I'd avoid saying "I don't know" because it is not necessary. Instead, I'd provide an answer using something like "I don't think so" or "It depends" or "Yes, I do know" or "No, I don't" or whatever you think will best express your answer to the question. A: I don't care answers "I don't care" or "I don't know". "I don't" is a standard negation that can be used for almost any question, but 1cdb36666d expression of the beta-galactosidase gene of Escherichia coli among wild type and recombinant strains. The linkage of the Escherichia coli beta-galactosidase (lacZ) gene to the natural lac operon (encoding the beta-galactosidase (lacZ), lactose permease (lacY) and O-antigen of lipopolysaccharide (lpsA)) was analysed in wild-type E. coli strain K-12 substrain C600. Methyl methane-sulphonate (MMS) mutagenesis of lpsA on the basis of the cloning of a recombinant lacY/lacZ fusion gene was used to analyse the linkage between the beta-galactosidase gene and the lpsA locus. The contribution of the structural gene product (lacZ) to the total beta-galactosidase activity in wild type and recombinant strains of E. coli was demonstrated.

Q: move variable value from a foreach to a textbox I have a foreach in which i am assigning values of a variable to a textbox like this

foreach (string s in _attempts) { SqlConnection sc = new SqlConnection(new ServerConnection()); sc.Open(); SqlCommand cmd = new SqlCommand("select QueryToAsk", sc);
    cmd.Parameters.AddWithValue("@textToAsk", s); SqlDataReader reader = cmd.ExecuteReader(); while (reader.Read())
