Adobe Photoshop Elements has been available since 1995. You can find it at various places on the Web. However, Adobe has also made the software available free, and it is entirely supported and developed by Adobe. Additionally, if you are not comfortable doing the entire process, you can buy an open-source graphic editing software like Gimp or Inkscape. What Makes Photoshop Elements Different? Adobe Photoshop Elements is not a complete Photo Editing software. However, it has great features that can help you create professional-looking images. Some of the features you might get from Photoshop are: An easy to use interface Easily resize images Apply different effects Warp Delete unwanted objects Convert between the file formats A Brief History In 1995, the first version of Photoshop was released. It was the only sophisticated photo-editing software available in the market at the time. Since then, Adobe had released its other software, like the Adobe Illustrator, the Adobe Flash, Acrobat and so on. However, the people were hoping for a standalone photo editing software. Also, Adobe made it so simple that users would not have to learn everything about using this software. Later, Adobe released Photoshop Elements which combines all of the features of Photoshop, as well as the features of the Adobe Creative Suite. However, it was released only on Windows. Recently, Adobe launched a consumer-oriented version of the software that works both on the desktop and on the mobile. This version is available on both Windows, Mac and Android. Now, the most advanced version of Photoshop is also available for free. Q: z-index applied to form not working I have this form, which has a sidebar and a content area that should overlap the input form. The sidebar is fixed in the left, and the content area is fixed in the right. When I check the checkbox, the input form "sticks" to the bottom of the content area (as it should), but the form (name, email,...) are not displayed below it. Why is the z-index not applying to the form? CSS: `.sidebar{ width:200px; position:fixed; left:0; top:0; background:#f8f7f4; z-index:1002; padding:1px; } .forminput{ width:200px; position:fixed; right:0; top:0; height:100%; background:#f8f7f4; }` HTML: Vorname: Nachname: Text A: you should try removing the z-index for the form: `.forminput{ z-index: auto; ... }` Show HN: New devlog - Blackmist ===== TeMPORaL I love the ideas behind this web site, but I think it needs to be simplified. The first thing that comes to my mind is that

The Earth Museum in Menlo Park boasts a "discovery center" full of huge models like Life-size, a 715-foot-long representation of the San Andreas Fault. But this summer the museum is suspending its earthquake programs and offering fewer visitors as it wrestles with its own earthquake safety policies. Most of the tourists who wander through the museum are not aware of the earthquake safety precautions, said Bill Fagan, a geologist and senior research specialist at the museum who oversees its earthquake exhibit. The museum has three exhibits — a street outside its entrance, an exhibit room and a three-story exhibit tower — that describe the force of the earth's most powerful earthquake, the 1906 San Francisco-to-San Jose quake. A large model of a section of the San Andreas fault lies on the museum's street. Now, the museum is taking a step back from its central theme. Visitors will not see the models or a show of 7,000 crumpled newspapers that represents how much destruction and cleanup was caused by the quake. "We've really got to fight over the next two months to get our house in order," said Fagan, who said the museum's earthquake exhibit is suffering from funding cuts in its state earthquake program. The earthquake safety policy is not just about safety, he said, but about ensuring that visitors are informed about the dangers of being near an earthquake fault. "When you're within three miles [5 kilometers] of a fault, there is a possibility that a large earthquake could happen," Fagan said. "What we really need to focus on is to make sure that visitors understand that." The museum began suspending its earthquake programs this summer because of budget cuts in the state-run California Earthquake Authority, which provides earthquake education programs for the museum, which opened in 1956. The authority's budget has dropped about $2 million in recent years, Fagan said. The museum has stopped regular summer programs but will let tourists take a free tour of the damage done by the 1906 quake. And it will still have an annual display of crumpled newspapers at Halloween. Alaska-based World of Kinks, which creates earthquake-themed songs, will perform at the museum Oct. 10-11 to promote the California Earthquake Authority's Ready for the Big One educational program. The museum also hired a former
